

Today was a good day. It began extra early, as we breakfasted early at 6:30 so as to have time to attend a Holy Communion service with the seminary students at the nearby chapel. Four languages were represented (German, English, Portuguese and Xitswa) and it felt a little like Pentecost: it was excellent. Clarence gave a wonderful and short sermon - he only had a night's notice - and we "proclaimed the Lord's death and resurrection" together on a beautiful Aldersgate Tuesday. On this day (May 24) in 1738, John Wesley had his famous heart warming experience in London in which he truly came to terms with the gospel of grace. The whole service reminded me how great God is that very different people from multiple countries can be Sons and Daughters of God together, even sharing a common spiritual heritage. It was a quickening way to start the day.
